Meet the Patient

Interview an AI patient the way you would in clinic, then tell them which lens you'd recommend. This is a working prototype, not the finished stand — one patient, Peter Walsh, and the parts we want you to feel.

Four things, or it won't work

1. Use Google Chrome. Safari will not let the page choose your microphone.
2. Wear headphones. Without them the patient hears himself through your speakers and talks over you.
3. Allow the microphone when Chrome asks. If you miss the prompt, click the Mic box at the top of the page to bring it back.
4. Find a quiet room. He listens for you to stop talking, so background noise makes him wait, or interrupt.

Then click Peter's card and start talking. He'll greet you and wait.

Take the history. Then recommend.

> “What's brought you in to see me today?”

> “Tell me about what you do with your days.”

> “Talk me through your driving — how much at night?”

> “What close-up work do you do?”

> “How do you feel about glasses?”

Ask open questions and let him talk. The things that should change your mind only come out if you ask properly — and if you haven't found them by the fourth question, he'll start volunteering them.

When you're ready, say the lens name in the same breath as the recommendation:

> “Based on all that, I'd recommend the monofocal lens for you.”

Try the wrong one too. That's the interesting bit.

It's a prototype. Expect rough edges.

- He takes about three seconds to appear. We know. We're working on it.
- One patient today. Margaret and Rami exist and are being tested; Peter is the one we're confident enough to put in front of you.
- Clinical detail is placeholder. Every number on his file is invented and will be replaced by Alcon Medical Affairs. Don't read anything into it.
- Things will go wrong. That's what today is for. Tell us what felt wrong rather than what looked broken — the first is harder to fix and matters more.

> Come back to it whenever you like. It runs off a machine in our office, so if it is ever unreachable we are mid-change rather than gone. Give us a shout and we will tell you when it is back.
